

In 2018, we developed an initial formulation of optimization-based expansion planning of natural gas pipelines and power system operations during periods of increased simultaneous demand (i.e. extreme cold weather). These preliminary models demonstrated the technical feasibility of coordinating the expansions of these systems and demonstrated the efficiency and resiliency gains that can only be met through coordinated expansion planning. The core elements of electric power and natural gas expansion planning and modeling were also released.